Lake Parime Recent geological investigations suggest that a lake may have existed in northern Brazil, but that it dried up some time in the 18th century. Both Manoa (Lokono language) and Parime (Kalina language) are believed to mean "big lake". Some explorers proposed that the seasonal flooding of the Rupununi savannah may have been misidentified as a lake. It was reputedly the location of the fabled city of El Dorado, also known as Manoa, much sought after by European explorers. The search for Lake Parime led explorers to map the rivers and other features of southern Venezuela, northern Brazil, and southwestern Guyana before the lake's existence was definitively disproved in the early 19th century. Repeated attempts to find the lake failed to confirm its existence, and it was dismissed as a myth along with the city.
