Premiers and chief ministers of the Australian states and territories The premiers and chief ministers of the Australian states and territories are the heads of the executive governments in the six states and two self-governing The premiers and chief ministers of the Australian states and territories are the heads of the executive governments in the six states and two self-governing territories of Australia. They perform the same function at the state and territory level as the Prime Minister of Australia performs at the national level. The King of Australia and the state governors are the formal repositories of executive power; however, in practice they act only on the advice of state premiers and ministers except in extreme circumstances, such as a constitutional crisis 761b18509a

States and territories of Australia They have their own constitutions, legislatures, executive governments, judiciaries, law enforcement agencies and emergency services that administer and deliver public policies and programs. The states are partially-sovereign administrative divisions that function as self-governing polities, having ceded some sovereign rights to the federal government. The states and territories are the sub-national constituent entities and the second level of government of Australia. The states are partially-sovereign The states and territories are the sub-national constituent entities and the second level of government of Australia. Territories can be autonomous and administer policies and programs much like the states in practice, but are still legally subordinate to the federal government 761b18509a

Proposals for new Australian states the 19th century, there have been proposals for the creation or incorporation of new states of Australia. Chapter VI of the Constitution of Australia provides for the admission of new states to the federation. Proposals have included admitting territories to statehood, admitting independent countries (or their dependent territories), and forming new states from parts of existing states. However, no new states have been added since the federation of six former British self-governing colonies in 1901, as states of the new Commonwealth of Australia.
