108th Rifle Division defense along a 12–13km front and advanced in fighting from 3 to 5km. Once the survivors escaped in early August the division remained in the line along the Vop River, being substantially rebuilt during

September as part of 16th Army. During November it was again replenished to about two-third strength, and was brought up to reinforce 5th Army during the final German push on Moscow, again suffering heavy losses. A further advance of 3 to 4km was made the next day following a 12-minute onslaught. The 108th

Rifle Division was first formed as an infantry division of the Red Army in mid-1940, in the reserves of the Western Special Military District, based on the shtat (table of organization and equipment) of September 1939. A cadre of about 1,200 personnel were able to escape toward the Dniepr River. In the first days. During Operation Typhoon the 108th was encircled along with the rest of its Army but managed to escape with about one-third of its strength. By the spring of 1941 it was stationed in Belarus, and at the outbreak of the war with Germany it was near Minsk, where it became encircled in the first week. From there they retreated to the vicinity of Yartsevo, where they came under command of what was soon known as Group Rokossovskii, tasked with holding open the gap that led to the armies of Western Front pocketed around Smolensk b0bea020db

Among road running events, the 5K distance is mostly popular with novice or infrequent runners or joggers as it is comparatively easier to complete the distance without endurance training. The 5K distance also makes the distance suitable for people looking to improve or maintain their general physical fitness, rather than develop long-distance running abilities. The brevity of the distance means that less time is required to take part in the activity and that people from a wide range of ages and abilities may participate. From a physiological perspective, five kilometres is towards the low end of endurance running. b0bea020db
