The Flea (poem) poetry. Fleas were everywhere throughout the renaissance, both in real life and erotic poetry. The poem uses the conceit of a flea, which has sucked blood from the male speaker and his female lover, to serve as an extended metaphor for the relationship between them. Donne's speaker enviously describes the flea's ability "The Flea" is an erotic metaphysical poem (first published posthumously in 1633) by John Donne (1572-1631). The speaker tries to convince a lady to sleep with him, arguing that if their blood mingling in the flea is innocent, then sexual mingling would also be innocent. The exact date of its composition is unknown, but it is probable that Donne wrote this poem in the 1590s when he was a young law student at Lincoln's Inn, before he became a respected religious figure as Dean of St Paul's Cathedral. His argument hinges on the belief that bodily fluids mix during sexual intercourse d7de0429a4

According to Laurence Perrine, this poem, along with many other of Donne's poems, solidifies his place in the literary movement, creating what is now known as metaphysical poetry. Although the term was not found until after his death, it is still widely used and will continue to be traced back to work such as "The Flea". d7de0429a4
