Grey-necked rockfowl Its unusually long tail is used for balance, and its thighs are muscular. The bird's cheeks and eyes are covered in a large, circular black patch that, though narrow, connects and divides the carmine and powder blue skin at the peak of the crown. Its distribution is patchy, with populations often isolated from each other. It has no recognized subspecies, though some believe that it forms a superspecies with the white-necked rockfowl. Also known as the grey-necked picathartes, this passerine is mainly found in rocky areas of close-canopied rainforest from south-west Nigeria through Cameroon, Equatorial Guinea, and south-west Gabon. The rockfowl typically chooses to live near streams and inselbergs in its forested habitat. It has no recognized subspecies, though some believe that it forms a superspecies with the white-necked rockfowl. It additionally lives on the island of Bioko. Though the bird is usually silent, some calls are known. The grey-necked rockfowl has grey upperparts, a light grey breast, and lemon-coloured underparts. The tradition declined following the invention of machines such as the combine harvester, but despite this has persisted into modern times across Devon and Cornwall albeit to a more limited extent. In Devon the tradition was still recorded as occurring regularly on the Exmoor coast in 1950, and more recently has seen reintroduction elsewhere such as Stoke where it occurs annually alongside the Village Summer Fair. In Cornwall there was an organised revival of the practice on five farms in the 20 years after the Second World War by the Old Cornwall Society, which still organises most events where the tradition is practised to this day. bcf2a184af

Neck The neck is the part of the body in many vertebrates that connects the head to the torso. Anatomically, the human neck is divided into four compartments: vertebral, visceral, and two vascular compartments. It supports the weight of the head and protects the nerves that transmit sensory and motor information between the brain and the rest of the body. Within these compartments, the neck houses the cervical vertebrae, the cervical portion of the spinal cord, upper parts of the respiratory and digestive tracts, endocrine glands, nerves, arteries and veins. The muscles of the neck, which are separate from the compartments, form the boundaries of the neck triangles.
