However, in DSM-5 published in 2013, it has been reclassified into its own distinct category. In response, the individual often tries to neutralize these thoughts by performing specific actions, which is known as compulsions. According to the latest edition of DSM, obsessions are unwanted, repetitive thoughts that cause significant anxiety. Although SO-OCD is not mentioned as such in the chapter "Obsessive-Compulsive and Related Disorders" of the DSM-V, the chapter on "Paraphilic Disorders" briefly mentions it when differentiating pedophilia from Pedophilia-OCD: "there are occasional individuals who complain about ego-dystonic thoughts and. However, the cortex volume of the operculum is. ; Kinsley, C. It has not been determined if delayed-maturation of this frontal circuitry contributes to the development of OCD or if OCD is the ailment that inhibits normal growth of structures in the frontal striatal, frontal cortex, or striatum. G; Kinsley, C. More specifically, structures such as the caudate nucleus, volumes of gray matter, white matter, and the cingulate have been identified as being less developed in people with OCD in comparison to individuals that do not have OCD (Lambert, K.). However, the use of neuroimaging has equipped researchers with evidence of some brain structures that are consistently less adequate and less matured in patients diagnosed with OCD in comparison to brains without OCD.
