Lip kissing, known more technically as osculation (osculate, meaning to touch, from the Latin "osculum", meaning kiss) is not universal. It is not common in the traditional cultures of China or Japan. The lip kiss is said to have been invented by the people of ancient India, although the earliest Indian records—about 2000 B.C.—indicate that their prior custom was a nose or "sniff" kiss. By the time the famous Indian manual of sex and love—the Kama Sutra—was written in the fourth century, the lip kiss was well established. The practice of kissing with the lips spread westward to Persia, Syria, Greece, Italy, and eventually to the countries that make up Northern Europe... 780e5e1a5c Physical segregation within buildings is achieved with judicious use of walls, curtains, and screens.
