Originally founded in 1977 as the British Association for Counselling, aided by a grant from the Home Office Voluntary Service Unit, it had emerged from the Standing Conference for the Advancement of Counselling. This body was inaugurated in 1970 at the instigation of the National Council for Voluntary Organisations. It was co-founded by the humanist activist Harold Blackham, and drew on detailed work Blackham had done for a non-religious counselling service for the British Humanist Association, which he led at the time. The organisation's Chair was Nicholas Tyndall, Chief Officer at the National Marriage Guidance Council (which later become Relate).

Career counseling is closely related to, but not identical with, career guidance, vocational guidance, career coaching, employment counseling, and career education. The boundaries between these terms vary across countries, languages, institutions, and professional traditions. In general usage, career guidance is often used as a broad umbrella term for information, education, assessment, advice, and systems-level support, whereas career counseling more often refers to a counselling-based intervention conducted individually or in small groups. In practice, the terms are frequently combined as career guidance and counselling to reflect the overlap between the activities. 6cb1779267 School counselors are employed in elementary, middle, and high schools, in district supervisory settings, in Counselor Education faculty positions (usually with an earned Ph.D. in Counselor Education in the USA or related graduate doctorates abroad), and post-secondary settings doing academic, career, college access/affordability/admission, and social-emotional counseling, consultation, and program coordination.
