== In runic songs == Väinämöinen requires three magic words or luotteet to finish creating his boat and wants his brother Joukahainen to go get them from the legendary shaman Antero Vipunen. However, Joukahainen says that Vipunen is long since dead and buried. Väinämöinen proceeds to travel to the underworld to meet him, as he as a fellow shaman could: this journey could be described in ways such as "walking on men's swords and women's needles" or Väinämöinen's left foot being the first thing to sink when Väinämöinen falls into Vipunen's mouth. Inside Vipunen, Väinämöinen creates a forge and starts hammering, causing pain for Vipunen. He spits Väinämöinen out, giving him the words he needs.

The term Leechbook is not related to leeches as such, although they were used in ancient medicine, but a modernisation of the Old English word lǣce-bōc ('book of medical prescriptions', literally Old English lǣce 'physician' + bōc 'book'). The text survives in only one manuscript, which is in the British Library in London, England, and can be viewed in digitised form online. The manuscript contains a further medical text, called Leechbook III, which is also covered in this article.
