Edna Murphey Murphey called the deodorant, Odorono (Odor-o-no) and started the company Odorono Co. Edna subsequently found this antiperspirant useful on underarms and began marketing the product to women. There Edna Murphey was the creator of the Odorono brand of deodorant and originator of modern-day deodorant marketing strategies (1912). There had been other previous deodorant/antiperspirant inventions previous to Murphey's, however, Murphey's was the product that became widely distributed. Murphey's father, Dr. Abraham D. antiperspirant to help surgeons with sweaty hands. Many potential users thought the item was either unnecessary, potentially harmful to their health, or that the red color of the product would damage their clothing. Edna subsequently found this antiperspirant useful on underarms and began marketing the product to women. Murphey, a physician, developed the liquid antiperspirant to help surgeons with sweaty hands. At the time, antiperspirant products were not widely used, and Murphey was, for the most part, unsuccessful at selling the product in the office she rented in Cincinnati

Odorono began selling after Murphey took the product to Atlantic City in 1912 for a Summer long exposition. Subsequently, Murphey began advertising the product in newspapers in major cities. In 1918, Murphey took out a US$50,000 bank loan, and hired James Webb...
